DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Resh Mill Site is located along Resh Road at its junction with Spade Road near the point where it crosses Rush Run, a tributary of the Conococheague Creek, in Washington County, Maryland. The mill was situated along the creek while the house, which still stands is located on the side of a hill south of the creek.

The mill is said to have been a stone and wood building and was torn down earlier in this century. It was a flour mill.

The house overlooks Resh Road and the mill site. It faces northeast. The dwelling is a one and a half story, five bay brick structure resting on stone foundations which become a full story in height at the front elevation, accommodating the slope of the land. A double porch included under the main roof span extends along the front elevation of the building. The entire structure has been painted white. Bricks at the front elevation are laid in Flemish bond while American or common bonding was used in the other walls.

Windows and doors appear to be placed at random. Most windows have single pane sashes while some have two over two pane sashes. All are held within narrow frames with wide wooden lintels. Entrances are located at the second and fourth bays from the east corner of the front elevation at the main story level. Two other doors are located immediately beneath these at the ground floor. The doors are framed similarly to the windows with those at the upper level having transoms. The porch which provides access to the main story is reached by a flight of steps at its east corner. The porch appears to be original but is supported by square pillars of a type usually associated with the early 20th century.

The roof is sheathed with modern shingles and extends beyond the end walls of the house. Brick chimneys are located inside the end walls.

A small barn stands east of the house. The buildings appear to be in good condition and are included on a tract containing 25.64 acres.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Resh's Mill Site, located on Resh Road near Resh Run, a tributary of the Antietam Creek, now has a one and a half story brick house and a small barn. The stone and wood flour mill which once stood on the property was torn down earlier in this century. The house would appear to date from the mid 19th century. With a double porch extending across its front elevation, it is characteristic of a number of houses in this region.

Milling was an important industry in Washington County during the 18th and 19th centuries, when grain was a major crop and where water power for grinding was available. Although the mill building is no longer standing, its site does not appear to have been disturbed and there is a great possibility that much archeological evidence remains.
